Graphic design There are two Photoshop versions: Photoshop CC and Photoshop CC Elements. Photoshop CC is the typical version and is focused on creating 3D designs and other advanced graphics. Elements is geared towards standard photos and 2D designs. Photoshop CC is more versatile and can be used for complex designs, 3D designs, photo retouching and other advanced photo editing activities. Photoshop CC includes a large number of additional editing tools that are not included in Photoshop Elements, such as the Lasso Tool, selections tools, layers and blending modes. Photography When editing photos, you might want to include the original image in the background. For this purpose, the original image can be kept as the background while changes are made to the main photo (the foreground). Or, you can duplicate the photo, and the new copy becomes the foreground while the original image (the background) is not touched. If you want to mask out portions of the foreground or background for variety, you can use the Masking tool, which lets you cut out selected areas. You can also combine masking with the Healing tool, which makes it possible to smooth out areas of the photo. To blend areas of the image, you can use the Blend Tool, which includes a number of different Blending Modes to help you change the color and appearance of selected areas of the photo. Photoshop CC also includes a powerful selection tool known as the Lasso Selection Tool, which lets you draw around areas of the photo that you want to select. You can make selections from any area of the photo. If you want to make a selection from another photo, you can use the Free Transform feature to resize the photo to fit the selection area. When making selections, you will see the selection area outlined in orange around the selected portion. You can resize the area by grabbing the selection outline. Alternatively, you can use the Eraser tool to erase the selection area. Special effects Adobe Photoshop CC is a powerful photo editor, but it does not have all the different tools and features that the full version has. For example, Photoshop CC does not have a powerful selection tool like the Lasso Selection Tool. Adobe Photoshop CC also lacks the regular Photoshop tools, including the Brush tool, the Magic Wand tool and the healing tools. When it comes to special effects, the Photoshop CC version is pretty limited. It does have a few of the same effects as Photoshop CC and Elements 05a79cecff

For example, I have a Product model which has an array of choices for attributes like color, gender, and sizes. Something like this: $validator = Validator::make(Input::all(), ['attribute_name_1' =>'required', 'attribute_name_2' =>'required', 'attribute_name_3' =>'required', 'attribute_name_4' =>'required']); I would like to add a rule that validates these checkboxes if the are selected. How can I do this? A: I think this should do what you want: $validator = Validator::make(Input::all(), ['attribute_name_1' =>'required|exists:selectAttributeOptions,attribute_name_1', 'attribute_name_2' =>'required|exists:selectAttributeOptions,attribute_name_2', 'attribute_name_3' =>'required|exists:selectAttributeOptions,attribute_name_3', 'attribute_name_4' =>'required|exists:selectAttributeOptions,attribute_name_4']); The syntax of the first line is a bit cumbersome but I think you'll understand. Basically it says for every attribute that you want to validate, make sure the value matches what exists in the selectAttributeOptions array. Explanation: We have Attribute name 1 Attribute

Los Angeles Mayor Eric Garcetti is pushing for a new idea to streamline the permitting process for large projects: use a single set of standards and cut back on the layers of bureaucracy that halt development. The mayor wants to write an ordinance that would create a unified set of development standards in Los Angeles. This, he argues, would make it easier and cheaper to put up tall residential towers like he and other mayors have sworn to do. The mayor's plan is different from a one-size-fits-all regulation many cities have in place. Garcetti wants to establish a series of guidelines and categories of development that would allow different sectors of the city to compete to create the most innovative, beautiful and awe-inspiring structures. City councilmember Paul Koretz, who represents Westwood and Beverly Hills, said he is open to a concept that would do away with the LADWP's local flood standards, for instance. "In a perfect world we could do away with the flood zones entirely," Koretz said. "This is the way out of a lot of of problems." Garcetti envisions two- to five-story developments clustered in areas like downtown, West Hollywood and Hollywood, places that developers have not been able to build in the past. "There's a reason why it's easier to build the next Staples Center than a housing development," Garcetti said. "We have a system that doesn't do justice to our very best assets." For years, Garcetti has been promising ambitious housing measures as a way to combat homelessness and vacant units in L.A. He made the promise in both of his mayoral campaigns. The mantra has taken on new urgency in recent months as Garcetti is finishing his first year in office. A report published in August by the University of California's Lusk Center for Real Estate determined that only one-third of all city buildings were zoned for residential construction, and that most of those were either existing multifamily homes or shopping centers. The study found that only two-thirds of the 1,378 parcels in L.A. that are zoned for single-family residential development actually have homes built on them. About 300 of those are active, according to the report. This is in stark contrast to other major U.S. cities where dense, walkable downtowns
