Role of muscarinic acetylcholine in the non-desensitization of cholinergic nerve terminals. Acetylcholine (ACh) bound to a muscarinic receptor located at the membrane of the nerve terminal causes an increase of permeability to Na^+ , K^+ and Ca^{2+} ions and a reduction of the membrane potential. The time course of the response to the external application of agonist is short, usually below 10 s. This means that it takes only a short time to inactivate the receptor. The application of an excess of agonist, for example, ACh, then produces a rundown of the response, "desensitization". Desensitization normally corresponds to a marked and sustained reduction of the permeability changes and membrane depolarization. This phenomenon is produced after the blockade of the transmitter reuptake by a long term application of choline esters (e.g. carbamylcholine). If the receptor is "blocked" by a high, nonecstatic concentration of ACh, the response can be restored, "reinforcing". The degree of "reinforcement" depends on the residual number of receptors in the membrane. The interactions between the various sites of the receptor-channels-membrane complex which produce and regulate the "desensitization" process are reviewed. A simple model for the "desensitization" process is presented in which the receptor-ligand complex itself opens a new ionic channel. The process of "reinforcing" is discussed. The possible importance of cyclic receptor-ligand interaction in the process of "desensitization" and "reinforcing" is pointed out. Mt.
